

Executive readiness

Executive readiness report

Full facet-level report • 40 questions • confirmed across 10 facets

52 / 100 • Developing range

Prepared for Jordan Rivera

Date October 1, 2026

Profile Team player

theuntaughtlessons.com

Contents*1*Executive summary*2*Your profile in depth

- Your profile, in depth
- Possible blind spots

3Strengths and growth edges

- Your top strengths
- Your growth edges

4Working with others

- Value to a team
- Your working style
- Communication guide

5Next steps and appendix

- Your five areas, in detail
- Suggestions for development
- How this report is built

1

Executive summary

Where you stand right now, at a glance.

Developing range, confirmed across 10 facets

You are dependable on most things. One area, often steadiness under pressure or finishing without being chased, slows you down.

Filled points count toward your score.
Hollow points describe your style, with no better or worse end.

Profile: Team player, cooperative, fair, easy to work with

Top strengths: Self-Discipline, Orderliness

Growth edges: Achievement-Striving, Anxiety

2

Your profile in depth

How Team player shows up day to day, under pressure, and in how you decide.

Team player

Cooperative, fair, easy to work with

This comes from your own numbers: Self-Discipline and Cooperation are where you scored highest (63 and 63), and Achievement-Striving is your clearest growth area (38).

Personal style

You naturally look for the version of a plan that works for everyone involved, and you are genuinely good at spotting where two people are talking past each other. Fairness matters to you more than winning an argument, and you would rather find a solution that holds the group together than one that is faster but leaves someone out. That instinct makes you valuable, though it can also mean you delay a decision that really only needed one clear answer.

Under pressure, you work to keep the group functioning even if that means setting aside your own position temporarily. In an unfamiliar situation, your instinct is to figure out who else is involved and how to keep everyone aligned, before deciding on the substance of what to do.

Interacting with others

You pay close attention to how people are getting along, not just what they are working on, and you often catch friction before it becomes a real problem. People trust you to be fair, which means they bring you disagreements to help sort out. The cost is that you can end up carrying the emotional weight of a team's dynamics on top of your own actual work.

People trust you to represent their interests fairly, which is why they often ask you to speak for the group rather than speaking for themselves. That trust is well earned, but it also means your own individual voice can get folded into the group's, even when you have a distinct view worth hearing.

Decision making

You look for the option that keeps the group functioning, which usually means weighing several people's positions before landing on an answer. This produces decisions that hold up well because people feel heard, but it can also mean a call takes longer than it needs to, or that you soften a decision that really needed to be clear and one sided.

When a decision does not land well, you tend to look at how the process could have included people better, more than whether the decision itself was wrong. This keeps relationships intact but can mean a genuinely bad call gets reframed as a process issue instead of being corrected.

Where you add the most

Work across teams where people talk past each other.

What to watch

Keeping the peace can delay a hard call. Some decisions need you to pick a side.

People with a similar style

Alan Mulally

Former CEO, Ford Motor Company

Known for a "one team" collaborative style credited with a major company turnaround.

Mary Barra

Chair and CEO, General Motors

Known for steady, collaborative leadership across a large, complex organization.

Gregg Popovich

Head coach, San Antonio Spurs

Known for building a culture around the team, not any single star player.

Public figures whose public style is often described this way. They have not taken this assessment. This is for reflection, not a claim about them.

Possible blind spots

Patterns you may not fully see from the inside, worth checking against how others actually experience you.

You may not notice how often you default to the group's apparent preference even when you privately disagree, since smoothing things over feels like the responsible choice in the moment. Over time, this can mean your own judgment gets less visible than it should.

Colleagues may also mistake your fairness for having no strong opinions at all, when in fact you often have a clear view you are simply choosing not to lead with. Stating your position occasionally, even briefly, corrects that impression.

3

Strengths and growth edges

Your two highest facets, and the two with the most room to grow.

Your top strengths

Self-Discipline

63

You follow through on commitments without needing a reminder.

Orderliness

56

You keep your work organized, so others can pick it up and understand it.

Your growth edges

Achievement-Striving

38

You may do what is asked and stop there. Picking one goal to push past is a good place to start.

Anxiety

44

A tense meeting can stay with you longer than it should.

4

Working with others

What Team player brings to a team, how they work, and how colleagues get the best from them.

Value to a team

What Team player tends to bring to the people around them.

Bridges differences

- Notices and resolves friction before it becomes a real problem.
- Bridges people or groups who are talking past each other.
- Translates between people or groups who read situations differently.

Holds the group together

- Keeps collaboration functional even under disagreement.
- Holds a team together through disagreement without picking sides unnecessarily.
- Keeps collaboration intact through genuine disagreement.

Fair process

- Builds fairness and trust into how the team makes decisions.
- Makes sure quieter voices in a discussion actually get heard.
- Makes sure a decision feels fair, not just efficient.

Your working style

Style facets describe how you work. No level is better than another.

Assertiveness

44

You lead when the situation calls for it and follow when someone else is better placed.

Activity Level

50

Lower

Higher

You can speed up when needed but would rather not live at that pace.

Cooperation

63

Lower

Higher

You avoid friction and work hard to keep things smooth between people.

Altruism

44

Lower

Higher

You help when you see a need and keep your own work moving.

Communication guide

How colleagues and managers tend to work best with Team player.

What works

- Explain the reasoning, not just the decision: It is what makes a call feel fair.
- Give them the disagreement to resolve: They are good at it.
- Ask for their read on the team: They usually see the dynamics clearly.
- Be patient with the check-in: They want to hear from others before deciding.
- Acknowledge the glue work: Name it when they hold a group together through a hard moment.

What to avoid

- Do not force a fast, one sided call: Not before they have had time to check in.
- Do not mistake consensus seeking for no opinion: They usually have one, clearly.
- Do not hand them every conflict: Not all of it is theirs to fix.
- Do not overlook the effort: Keeping a group functioning smoothly takes real work.

5

Next steps and appendix

Your five areas at a glance, what to try next, and how this report is built.

Your five areas, in detail

All 10 facets you answered, rolled up into the same five areas as your shape.

Follow-through Mid 52

Achievement-Striving 38

Self-Discipline 63

Orderliness 56

Steadiness Mid 50

Anxiety 44

Self-Consciousness 56

Curiosity Mid 56

Intellect 56

Social energy Mid

47

Assertiveness

44

Activity Level

50

Warmth Mid

53

Altruism

44

Cooperation

63

Suggestions for development

Ideas worth trying, drawn from your growth edges and profile.

Make one unpopular call

Do it this month, without polling the room first.

Decide your position first

In your next group discussion, form your own view before asking for others'.

Let someone else mediate

Hand off the next disagreement that is not actually yours to fix.

Notice when agreement is stalling you

Catch one decision this week where seeking it delayed more than it improved.

Practice one uncomfortable call

Let a decision leave someone mildly unhappy.

These are habits, not a one-time fix. The Think, Speak, and Act Like an Executive™ cohort is built around practicing exactly this kind of habit with real feedback, not just reading about it. See how the cohort works.

How this report is built

The source

The full report selects 40 statements from the IPIP-NEO-120, an established, openly available personality measure built on the same five-area research tradition as the 20-question quick check (the short assessment page explains that tradition in full). Some statements run in the opposite direction, so their scores are reversed before a facet score is calculated.

How the score is built

Each of the 10 facets shown in this report runs on its own 0 to 100 scale, built from your own answers. Achievement-Striving, Self-Discipline, Orderliness, Intellect, Anxiety and Self-Consciousness average into the one readiness score on your executive summary. Assertiveness, Activity Level, Cooperation and Altruism describe your working style and sit outside that score on purpose, since neither end of a style facet is the better one. The shape on your summary page draws from the same five broad areas as the quick check, built here from these 10 facets rather than estimated from 20 broader questions.

Limits to keep in mind

- Self-report: This result comes from how you described yourself when you took the assessment. Mood, context and the impression you wanted to give can all affect an answer.
- Scope: This describes broad tendencies in how you work, not a diagnosis, and not a measure of intelligence, job performance or promotion potential.
- No percentile: UTL deliberately does not compare your result to a wider population. Comparing your own answers to each other says more about you than ranking you against other people would.

Read the full methodology, including the published source and what UTL added on top of it, at theuntaughtlessons.com/apps/readiness-assessment/how-it-works/.

The next step is practice, not another assessment

The Think, Speak, and Act Like an Executive™ cohort is built around practicing exactly the habits in this report, with real feedback, not just reading about them. Join the waitlist at theuntaughtlessons.com/programs.html to hear when the next cohort opens.

theuntaughtlessons.com